A checklist of the benthic marine plants of the archipelago of Madeira is presented based on published information and personal observations. This list includes 1 Spermatophyte and 359 algal species, comprising 64 Chlorophycota, 64 Chromophycota and 231 Rhodophycota. Fifteen doubtful records for the area are also included.

Introduction

The archipelago of Madeira, located in the Central Eastern Atlantic Ocean between the coordinates 30° to 33° N and 16° to 17° W (Fig. 1), comprises seven islands (Madeira, Porto Santo, Deserta Grande, Bugio, Selvagem Grande, Selvagem Pequena and Ilhéu de Fora). Only Madeira and Porto Santo are inhabited. Most of the islands are close to each other, except the Selvagens (Salvage islands) which are situated about half way between Madeira and the Canaries.

Phycological investigations were only sporadically conducted, mainly by visiting scientists and during small periods of time (see revision in Levring 1974). Among the first studies Piccone (1884) is worth mentioning, whose collections were deposited in the Department of Botany of the Naturhistorisches Museum in Vienna (W) and have been revised by Prud'homme van Reine et al. (1994). In this century the first studies were conducted by Gain and Mirande (1912), Gain (1914), Menezes (1926) and Cabioch (1974). Levring (1974), based on the previous investigations and on his own collections, listed 254 macroalgal species. A few years later, during the CANCAP expeditions of the Dutch Government (1977–1987), collections were done in several of the mid-Atlantic islands. The collections are deposited at the National Herbarium Nederland in Leiden (L). Part of the material was examined and several publications were made concerning the marine algal flora of the Madeira archipelago (Audiffred and Weisscher 1984, Audiffred and Prud'homme van Reine 1985, Haroun and Prud'homme van Reine 1993, Weisscher 1982, 1983).

Since Levring (1974), all the published information has been widespread, rendering difficult any biogeographical assessment of the Macaronesian algal flora.

The aim of this work is to compile an updated catalogue of the marine plants of the Madeira archipelago, including macroalgae and seagrasses.

Material and Methods

After a review of the pertinent references and revision of available live/preserved material, only valid records are included in this checklist. Many herbarium sheets have been revised by the authors. Herbarium abbreviations are from the Index Herbariorum (Holmgren et al. 1990). Most of the specimens are deposited in either L (CANCAP expeditions) or in the Herbarium of the Museu Municipal do Funchal (Historia Natural), some old specimens are kept in PAD and W. Doubtful records are kept separate and certainly need further attention.

The systematic arrangement, including the ordinal and lower classification schemes, mainly follows Silva et al. (1996). We have also adopted the new division (phylum) names Rhodophycota, Chromophycota (which includes Phaeophyceae) and Chlorophycota suggested by those authors. Besides, new taxonomic data for specific genera, such as Dictyota (Hörnig et al. 1992 a, b, 1993) and Laurencia/Chondrophycus (Nam 1999) are also incorporated. In some cases, the nomenclatural status suggested by Wynne (1998) in the recent revision of the western Atlantic tropical and subtropical marine flora is adopted. Genera and species appear alphabetically within their assigned family or genera, respectively. Subspecies and lower classification levels are not quoted. Nomenclatural authorities are given in full, mainly to avoid errors due to different abbreviation systems, Brummitt and Powell's (1992) compilation of names of authors is mainly followed. Besides, the recommendation of the ICBN (Greuter et al. 1994) to avoid using in is adopted. For each taxon the place where it was collected is given (M, Madeira; PS, Porto Santo; DG, Deserta Grande; SG, Selvagem Grande; SP, Selvagem Pequena; IF, Ilhéu de Fora; Selvagens or Desertas, when no specific place is referred to) together with the respective bibliographic references.

Summary

The number of macroalgal species found in the present study (Table I) is significantly lower than the ones recorded for the Canaries or the British Isles (642, see in Guiry 1997), but slightly higher than the one recorded for the Azores. The archipelago of Madeira, therefore, occupies an intermediate position between the Azores and the Canaries archipelagos. In agreement with Prud'homme van Reine and van den Hoek (1990) the marine algal flora of the Madeira archipelago is closely related to the flora of the Canaries, especially regarding the red algae, while the green and brown algal flora is more similar to that of the Azores.

Recent collections and personal observations indicate the number of species recorded for the Madeira archipelago and will increase in the near future.
